

ABSTRACT

A low cost method and system for efficiently implementing channel estimation in a wireless communication system using any desired length of a fast Fourier transform (FFT) independent of burst type or signal structure. The hardware complexity required to perform the channel estimation to process a plurality of different burst types is reduced. Simple tail zero-padding is used when the length of FFT is extended to a desired length for more efficient computation.